
USHERING A NEW AGE OF RESILIENCE

Over the last two years, the resilience of the world has been tested by unprecedented economic shocks, war in Europe, major geopolitical shifts, climate-change-related disasters and transnational security threats that no one had foreseen. Against this backdrop, how can the world build its resilience and demonstrate its capacity to provide collective and coordinated responses to such multiple shocks?

In this same context, is the world's economy about to experience a major shift in organization and finality? Will global welfare now depend on life quality indices instead of GDP? Will the world's economy move forward to a more frugal approach in its use of finite resources? Can innovation allow us to overcome resilience necessity?
